VISITORS ON CAMPUS

hospital corpsman in the U.S. Navy and has been employed as an ambulance attendant and an emergency-room technician in a hospital. He is a licensed vocational nurse.

"Our main role here is to help students get an education, and to help faculty teach," Johnson said. "We want to be available at all times to provide protection and services—whether it's preventing a theft, or referring a potential suicide to the Counseling Center, or letting in a professor who is locked out of his office."

"All the security officers are here to help anyone with problems. We want to help all the people on the campus to achieve their lawful goals. If students have to worry about their safety or their property, it will interfere with their studies. This also applies to the faculty—if they have to worry about being assaulted on the campus after dark, or having test papers stolen out of their desk, they cannot do as effective a job of teaching."

Johnson's office is in Room A-152 and his phone extension is 352, temporarily.

Under the new philosophy of campus security, the chief reports to the Dean of Students as part of the Student Personnel program. The new chief will confer with students to provide security for extracurricular events on campus, whenever students request it.
