Lifestyles

Dear Dr. Levner, What is a learning disability? Dr. M.M. Learning disability is a term and refers to a difficulty in daily learning rather than merely the inability to read. The terms "learning disability," "dyslexia," "reading disability," and "dyscalculia" are frequently used in place of each other. Learning disabilities are divided into two groups: primary (inhibited) and secondary (caused by a physical factor that interferes with learning). Primary disabilities are found in children who have: reading difficulties even with standard reading tests even though the child's I.Q. is often normal; deficiency in reading techniques and the inability to recognize words in a language; language impairment, such as the frequent spelling of a word in a conversation; a loss of function in a specific part of the brain; and short attention span and low frustration tolerance. A group of others who have difficulty reading include, of course, those who have been shown attention span and low back.

By Jeffrey S. Smolik, M.D., Cedars-Sinai Medical Center

Srs. Melinda and Sidney Garson have received a $200,000 bequest to benefit AIDS & Immune Disorders Center. The funds were left to the Medical Center by Hildy Sokoloff, a former nurse and Foreign Policy Institute representative who died in 1988 at age 72. The estate executor arranged for the money to be donated to the AIDS/IDC (based on conversations during Sokoloff's later years in which she expressed concern for the plight of AIDS patients in Los Angeles. The 22-bed 'unit, which opened in February 1990, is staffed by a multidisciplinary team that assists primary care physicians in the comprehensive treatment of ill patients. Staff of the unit includes pharmacy, education, psychology, and social work support provided to help patients through all phases of their illness.
