REHAB COUNSELING PROGRAM RE-ACCREDITED, ACQUIRES GRANT

The university's master's in rehabilitation counseling program has obtained the longest re-accreditation period given by the Council on Rehabilitation Education.

Approved for a five-year period, the program is a fully accredited, two-year course of study.

In addition, the counseling program has been awarded a long-term grant by the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Special Education. The grant will help increase the number of certified rehab counselors available to San Bernardino and Riverside county employers. It also will provide awards for graduate students and make more accessible in-service and independent living rehab training.

"There's a major shortage of rehab counselors across the country and so the federal government is focusing on that," says Dr. Jean Ramage, dean (Education).

"It's staggering," she adds, to think that "about one out of every four adults is likely to require rehabilitation services sometime in their adult life. That is just including alcoholics. That's not even talking about car accident victims" or others who will suffer life-altering incidents.

PROGRESS = NOISE + MOVEMENT + I M CONFUSED²

BY SAM ROMERO, PUBLIC AFFAIRS ASSISTANT

Remember grass? I do.

At the beginning of the summer there was a lot more of it on campus. I used to walk on it. I don't anymore. Today, the campus is a maze of thousands of feet of chain link fence and yellow caution tape blocking off where grass used to be. So, now I just walk past and remember when.

Back in the days of grass—before the trucks came, before the cranes, before the running of the bulldozers, Cal State, San Bernardino was sort of Shangri-la in that everything was in its proper place. Everything was where you could find it. (Unless you were looking for a parking space on a Monday morning on a school day, in which case a parking space was wherever you parked, even if it was in a tree.)

But these days building-and-renovation-mania has caught on. The Great Office Migration is underway, and students and staff and faculty and alumni and visiting rabbits and displaced bugs are seeing the campus map change faster than that of Eastern Europe's and what was once the Soviet Union. Even the rats, normally good at mazes, are confused.

Fortunately, there's been room for expansion in our small nation. Europe wasn't so lucky. We've seen no pitch battles over territory and no bloodshed, and everyone is very happy about that. Like reforms in Hungary three years ago, "all this has been accomplished peacefully, through negotiations."

Despite the absence of bloodshed, however, there have been a few tears shed.

Some have been shed over travelling great distances only to learn that the Office-of-Such-and-Such has now moved to That Building Across Campus, Room Hard-2-Find. Some have been shed over the loss of window space in the administration building, where a good window is hot property, and if you manage to finagle one you can't help but feel that the favor of the Lords of Architecture has shined upon you.

But most tears have been shed over all the racket.

I visited a couple of construction site offices on campus to find out what kinds of tools could make that much noise, and was eventually directed to talk to a man named Smitty, who was working on the third floor of the new Jack H. Brown Hall. It was a good thing they told me which floor. Smittys are as common as dust around construction sites. Go to any one in America and yell, "Hey, Smitty!" from the top frame of any building being constructed, and five will get you ten that half-a-dozen crew members will answer back.

Smitty was congenial. He even gave me a sample of the kind of heavy bolts they use to bolt down toilets. It has a couple of neat, loose, jangly parts connected to it, so I put it on my desk for people to fidget with as a tension reliever. I talked with another man, who was also helpful, and he sympathized with me about all the noise saying, "It sure as hell isn't the sounds of silence." Nope, it sure as heck wasn't, I agreed, and asked again what the heck it was.

I then learned the heck it was the sounds of .22-caliber, power-driven stud guns, skill saws, power drills, rotary hammers, the hollow echo of regular hammers pounding on steel, the beep, beep, beep of heavy machinery's backup warning lights, backhoes digging trenches, self-loading scrapers with paddle wheels that make them look like landgoing steamboats, 14-ton cranes, forklifts, manlifts, manlift buzzers, cutting torches and fireproofing machines, and that's just the outdoors.

Indoors, the sounds of more hammers, more saws, more stud guns and more walls being banged down to re-fangle office space rings through the halls.

So even though the din from well-tuned minds grinding out truth and theory has decreased over the summer months, the campus is still pretty noisy.

It's also pretty messy. In spots, it looks more like a lumberyard. Piles of dirt stand like giant ant hills. Weeds grow tall as people.

I didn't know a few weeks ago, as I sat on some very nice grass at the Redlands Bowl listening to the Hambro Quartet of Pianos, that Leonid Hambro, who had "forged a uniquely varied musical identity," was a mathematical genius to boot, and must have heard about all of the building activity at Cal State. From his travels by vehicle around the United States, he has developed this theorem: "The shortest distance between two points is always under construction."

Well, I know all the shifting around will come to an end. We will be able to find offices again. The grass and the trees will be replanted. Things won't be so messy anymore. But isn't that a quirk of progress? Sometimes it takes a little destruction before you can make life better.

THE BULLETIN BOARD

PANORAMA NAME CHANGES TO CAL STATE

Known as the Panorama ever since its premiere issue 24 years ago, the university's alumni magazine will carry a new look and a new name with this year's fall quarter edition.

Cal State, San Bernardino magazine will begin arriving in homes and around campus offices in October, says Cynthia Pringle (Public Affairs), the publication's editor.

After conducting some research, she adds, "We found that the name Panorama wasn't readily associated by our readers with Cal State. We felt the magazine needs to state clearly what it's about and who it's for to become more effective."

NOONTIME AEROBICS

Beginning Monday, Sept. 21, give your body a break with aerobics classes in the small gymnasium. The free classes will run from 12:10-12:50 p.m. every MWF. They are open to all faculty and staff. Volunteer instructors Elaine Berkholder (Health Center) and Lenora Venturina (Computer Center) will add some step exercises to this year's workout. For more information, call Mary Schmidt (Criminal Justice, Economics) at Ext. 5511.

LOCAL RESIDENT DONATES

A retired Chicago teacher, Joseph Bailey, who resides in Redlands, has contributed $5,000 to Cal State's Student Emergency Loan Fund, which makes small, temporary loans to financially needy students.

"When I was growing up I had financial problems of my own and was able to get gifts and small loans to help out," says Bailey. He earned scholarships to study at the University of Chicago and the University of Minnesota.

Bailey's commitment to education is evident in his continuing interest, says Ted Krug (Financial Aid). "This gift is a significant boost for the loan fund," he adds. "We would love to see more donors who share Mr. Bailey's interest in helping students."

COMMUNITY SERVICE

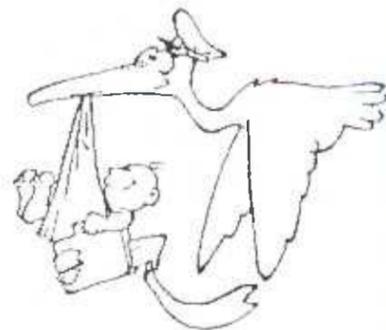

Ellen Gruenbaum presented a public lecture at Placentia Library on August 21 entitled "High Walls: Obstacles and Achievements in Women's Education in Saudia Arabia and Bahrain." The presentation was given in conjunction with a traveling exhibit at California libraries on "Gulf Arab States: Beyond Camels, Oil and Sand Dunes," sponsored by the California Council for the Humanities.
