This 632-page volume summarizes widely scattered information on general, population, quantitative, ecological, behavioral and biochemical genetics of flour beetles of the genus Tribolium; susceptibility and resistance to insecticides; effects of irradiation; possibilities of using Tribolium as a food source; methods of detecting infestations and possibilities of bringing these serious insect pests under control.

Dr. Sokoloff indicates that of the two earlier volumes, Vol. 1 dealt with the taxonomy, morphology, anatomy, histology, cytology, embryology and teratology of flour beetles, while Vol. 2 dealt primarily with ecological, nutritional, physiological and biochemical aspects, and their use in mathematical models in the field of animal ecology.

The monograph, totaling about 1,550 pages, will be used primarily as a reference by researchers in different fields throughout the world and by graduate students.
